PREFACE.

ON submitting to the public the first volume of the Transactions of the Medical and Chirurgical Society, the President and Council, to whom the management of its affairs is entrusted, feel it to be their duty to state the nature and objects of this Institution, and the claims which it possesses to professional patronage.

The want of a Society, founded upon liberal and independent principles, and conducted with the propriety and dignity which are worthy of the medical profession, had been long acknowledged : and a few physicians and surgeons in the year 1805, held a meeting for the purpose of considering the best means by which it might be obviated. They invited many gentlemen of eminence to join them, and thus a Society was formed, which, they soon had the satisfaction to see, comprised a very respectable portion of the professional rank and talent of the metropolis.

The present volume is composed of papers which have been communicated to this Society, and read at its meetings. The President and Council submit it to the consideration of the medical public, not without the hope, that it will support the claim of respectability and usefulness, which they are desirous that it should possess.

The papers which come before the Society have necessarily various degrees of value ; and in considering their merits with a view to publication, it is wished equally to avoid the extremes of fastidiousness, and want of discrimination. Brilliant discoveries in medicine and surgery, or the branches connected with them, are seldom made ; but the observing practitioner has various opportunities of improving the profession, by attention to the facts which come daily within his view, and by the management of the materials which are already in his possession.

The varied forms of disease, whether medical or surgical, and the modes of treatment which may be found adequate to their removal, are subjects concerning which the Society necessarily feels the highest interest. Cases having a fatal issue, however, are often not less instructive than such as terminate favourably. They frequently tend to point out more accurately the plan to be pursued in the treatment of similar complaints; they afford valuable information relative to the probable causes of failure; and when dissection is permitted, they throw light on the more intimate nature and modification of the disease.

The operative part of surgery opens a field of considerable interest and extent, and the number of gentlemen connected with hospitals in London, who are members of the Society, gives it the prospect of being able to communicate to the public, some valuable observations and improvements in this important branch of the profession.

Researches in anatomy, physiology, and that part of chemistry which is immediately connected with some of the branches of medicine, are also considered as appropriate objects of communication : and likewise descriptions of such deviations from healthy structure, with such curious facts in the natural history of the human body, as occasionally present themselves.

The particular periods at which the Medical and Chirurgical Society may publish its Transactions, must depend entirely on the quantity of valuable materials in its possession. As it is important, however, not to delay too long the publication of the communications with which the Society may be favoured, it is deemed advisable, rather to publish, within a moderate period, a small volume, than to wait till there is sufficient matter to form a large one.

The reading of such communications as are presented to the Society, forms one part of its ordinary business. The interchange of practical knowledge, in the way of easy conversation, is the other ; and the President and Council have much satisfaction in noticing the important advantages which have resulted, and still continue to result, from the opportunities which are afforded, in a meeting of liberal and enlightened professional men, of stating difficulties, imparting observations, or suggesting improvements in practice. In furthering this important object, the union of gentlemen in both branches of the profession, affords a greater facility of obtaining accurate information on many points of practice, than could have been derived from a Society, composed of either physicians or surgeons alone. It may be proper however to remark, that it does not at all enter into the plan of this institution, to suffer its proceedings to assume the form of debate or disputation.

The formation of a select and extensive medical library for the use of its members, is an object of considerable importance with the Society, and the President and Council observe with satisfaction, that partly by donations, and partly by purchase, a considerable number of valuable works has already been obtained.

Having made this general statement, the President and Council trust, that the honourable and dignified objects of the Medical and Chirurgical Society, and the independent principles on which it was founded, will insure to it the good wishes and co-operation of their professional brethren, both in and out of the metropolis. They wish it to be as extensively useful as possible, and will therefore be glad to receive communications on subjects of medicine and surgery, or the branches connected with them, and to insert in its Transactions those which may be thought worthy of publication.

Communications may be forwarded to the President or Secretaries, or transmitted through any other member of the Society.
